An exhibition of digital video and photography

Introduction

This exhibition demonstrates the diverse ways in which young people use digital technologies as tools in the production of moving and still images. It brings together recent work by pupils, students and parents at Bournside, students of Fine Art Digital Media at the University of Gloucestershire and students from St George's Centre, a pupil referral unit in Cheltenham.

Separated as we are by mainstream film and television, the works of moving image represent different kinds of responses. The pieces by Bournside students often work with a loosely unfolding plot, drawing upon a developing understanding of film narrative, theory and style. The pieces by the university students (and their Subject Leader, John Forster), are experimental, using the medium to engage with concepts and emotions in a conscious challenge to the mainstream.

The still images have been made by students using digital technology as one of many tools within the creative process. Some projects involve the use of digital cameras and software at the start, using the results to inspire powerful image manipulation programmes, transforming traditional artwork into new creations.

Making it still, made with pixels or pixels, we hope you enjoy the results.

Celebrating 100 years of schooling

On 2nd September 1907 Alderman Norman declared "Nothing can be too good for the education of the young". He was speaking in the brand new Gloucester Road Elementary Schools, built at a cost of £12,900 to teach 'basic subjects' to infants, boys and girls up to the age of 13. The school soon thrived, despite the upheaval of having to move during World War. One so that the Gloucester Road buildings could be used as a Red Cross Hospital.

In 1919 The Cheltenham Central School for Advanced Instruction opened on the Gloucester Road site for 500 boys and girls aged 11 to 15. At the first Open Day in 1920 the Headmaster Mr Herbert Burrows announced; "The basis of the curriculum is decidedly practical; but larger interests are borne in mind. We must have something more than commercially efficient boys and girls". The 'Central Schools' as they became known enjoyed a period of stability and growth during the 1920s and 30s.

Following the national reform of secondary education, it was declared in 1949 that Cheltenham Technical High School should replace the Central Schools, adapting the existing buildings at Gloucester Road. At the first Speech Day in 1952, the Head Mr Cartwright stated that he wished to instil in pupils "a readiness to take responsibility ...responsibility to God, to permanent values of justice, kindness and humility, to family, school, town, country and the international society of which we are a part, and to themselves - to make the best of their gifts." Two pupils stayed on to take A-levels in 1955, establishing the first ever Sixth Form.

In line with national initiatives, Cheltenham slowly moved towards the establishment of comprehensive schools during the 1960s and the Technical High School was selected for reorganisation. In 1967 building started on farmland at Bournside and in 1968 the school took over the 'Bournside Annexe'. By 1972 all the buildings were completed and in September of that year Cheltenham Bournside School opened as the first mixed comprehensive school in the town.

Since 1972 the school has expanded and developed massively, positioning itself at the leading edge of educational change, while still being foremost a school for the local community. The Sixth Form with over 500 students is one of the largest school-based Sixth Forms in the region. Bournside continues to offer a broad based curriculum, working in close partnership with business and the local community, and with a thoroughly global outlook. In 2007 we look back with pride at the achievements of the last 100 years, and look forwards into the future with confidence.
